"The Degradation of Sunday."

Under this heading the New York Tribune has an editorial, in which it protests against the increasing violations of the Sunday law in that city. The article treats the matter from the standpoint of "the public morals, the public health, and the general welfare," mainly ignoring the religious side of the question. It says, "a few years ago such a discussion would have seemed absurd. It did not come within the range of our ideas to imagine that the observance of Sunday was ever to be called in question in this community." The change is thus explained:

The invasion of the historic Sunday began with what used to be called "Bazaar Concerts," in which serious music was sometimes really given. But the solemn strains of the organ rapidly degenerated into the Lydian measures of the Opera House, and now nothing is left of the sacred concert but the name. On the East side of the city "Jack Sheppard" is given under that title, and in the great Erie palace on the West side the last pretense of disguise is dropped, and the classic assembly on week days in the Academy of Music. Business houses and beer-shops naturally follow the impulse given to Sabbath breaking by houses of amusement, and it may be judged by the symptoms visible in the Bowery, New York promises soon to be a busier town than any city in the world on the continent of Europe.

Following the above, the Tribune has the following comment on the benefits of Sunday observance:

The good resolutions formed, the evil purpose relinquished, the hearts quickened to higher charity and solicitude, works of charity and kindness, or even Sunday in this country, are simply part of our religious life. The music of the thousands of bells that fill the air of the morning is an audible and evident expression of a common sentiment as sweet as it is ennobling; but there is a far deeper harmony in the millions of prayers ascending at the same time from the earth bearing the unutterable sorrows and aspirations of men.

Of the tendency of the present course of things, the Tribune says:

It may be said that Sunday amusements will not interfere with the rest and the worship to which the day has been hitherto devoted. But it is a sufficient answer to this, first, that the prevalence of such amusements has a direct tendency to diminish Church-going, especially among the young, who could hardly be expected to resist the temptations held out to them by pleasure, which appeal to their strongest inclinations. And secondly, if such amusements become general they will employ a vast number of persons, to whom Sunday will cease to be a day of rest. The just instinct of irreligious people leads them to allow a degree of repose on Sundays to those whom they employ. The community ought to allow to its servants, who furnish its diversions, the same opportunity for rest and recreation. The little additional money they would earn by playing every night in the week would be but a poor compensation for what they would lose. In their interest, as well as in that of the public good, we hope that the attempt to secularize our Sundays may not succeed. It is hostile to all our traditions. The Christian Sunday is as much an Anglo-Saxon possession as trial by jury. It would be a National calamity to see it—we will not say desecrated but—degraded.

We have given the Tribune's view of this matter, as that of a leading public journal not much influenced by the religious estimate of the Sabbath. Its view is one that may be considered by all classes of people. The good growing out of the observance of one day in seven as a day of rest, is too frequently estimated from the standpoint of the sacredness of the Sabbath as a religious institution, and we have often thought its real merits were not appreciated by many who view it solely in that light.

Mr. Beecher's Case—The Parallelism Between it and the Cases of Falkland and Eugene Aram.

In your issue of Saturday last you favor your readers with a well considered and ably written article on Mr. Beecher's position before the public. The substance of the article is, that he performs his public and private functions with all his former vigor. That "he eats well, sleeps well," &c., &c., in fact that notwithstanding he has guilified "the totter of the 'damned,'" been on "the ragged edge of despair" and finally "even wished he was dead." He is to the public eye the Beecher of yore, as far as he makes himself known to the world; as you happily term it—"Richard's himself again." Your article concludes with the singular question—"Can any one give us an analysis rational of it?" One would have supposed that so able an article would not have stopped short at that point, but would have given an analysis of the case also. Without presuming to invade the sacred prerogatives of the sacred editorial, for which the writer of this has the same wholesome awe and veneration, and realizing that the Israelite had for the Temple, the Egyptian for the Pyramids, the Hindu for the Juggernaut, and your printer's devil for the foreman of your office. He, the writer, will modestly endeavor to give a solution of the matter. Mr. Beecher is either innocent or guilty. If innocent—as all may hope he is for the credit of human nature—what else could be expected to do than just precisely what he is now doing? He is a man to whom nature has been generous of her gifts. He has attained a shining eminence—he stands before the world as a great Christian teacher, acknowledged by all civilized society as the most popular pulpit orator of the day. Standing on such a dazzling eminence, is it not meet for him to gird his strength together, both mental and physical; and bravely defend himself from the shocking charges which have been preferred against him? A reputation such as his is never made in a day, nor is he going to lose it, if consummate tact and wonderful mental and physical power can save it. Indeed, in a man of such shining capacity, as Beecher, we would expect such a charge as Tilton's, if false, to bring more to the front all the might of his energies. Innocence fears nothing; it is only guilty that is expected to do so.

Suppose him to be guilty; if so, could he act as he is doing? Surely he might, indeed it might be expected of him more out of ten of equal ability with himself, to act precisely as he is doing. It is to be regretted that men will not credit their crimes against society and assume front of innocence, but it is human nature. Better far, if guilty, they would do as the penitent Psalmist, confess their guilt and be "sorry for their sin." If guilty, Mr. Beecher has determined to "stand the hazard of the die," by boldly picking up the gauntlet so publicly thrown down by his enemies. The eyes of the world are upon him,—and this no one knows better than himself,—and clothed with his own trustworthy he accepts the wager of battle, and will, with a heroism that challenges the admiration of even his enemies, fight to the bitter end and pluck a seeming victory from even defeat itself. He has however no pigmy to deal with. Tilton is a foe man worthy of his steel. In the cultivated world, considered as a literary man, Tilton is unquestionably his superior. He has quite a high reputation in his own country as a man of mark in literary circles, and has also a transatlantic fame of no small measure.

That Mr. Beecher "eats well, sleeps well," &c., and performs his general functions just as before his calamity is not at all strange, even if he is guilty of what he is charged. A man of his high mental caliber, and like him, of full physical habit, and a generous liver, will not be apt to play the eremite in such an emergency. It is one of the peculiarities of our nature that trouble may jar our physical functions for a time; but nature will at last assert its supremacy. Even a convicted criminal loses not his appetite. For instance, the case of Tilton, let the reader refer to the character of "Falkland," in Caleb Williams, one of Godwin's works, and he will have a masterly illustration of how an originally noble nature, gifted with the most shining talents, may, by force of will, bend himself proudly before the world, even when guilty of the dreadful crime of murder. He is the same stately, unbending Falkland, and to the public eye, outdoes even his previous self. Take Bulwer's "Eugene Aram," and you have another splendid example of how a man of transcendent ability, will, so to speak, almost outdo even himself when the occasion calls for all his energies. A gifted scholar, accused of the crime of murder, and guilty of it, too, denies his guilt, and dedicates society to his innocence by championing his own case before a jury!

In conclusion, it may be said that Mr. Beecher's will is his pilot, and right well he does weather the storm. Armed in the name of a full measure of renown, even when guilty of the dreadful crime of murder. He is the same stately, unbending Falkland, and to the public eye, outdoes even his previous self. Take Bulwer's "Eugene Aram," and you have another splendid example of how a man of transcendent ability, will, so to speak, almost outdo even himself when the occasion calls for all his energies. A gifted scholar, accused of the crime of murder, and guilty of it, too, denies his guilt, and dedicates society to his innocence by championing his own case before a jury!

Willing to Oblige.
A very prepossessing young lady, canvassing for a popular book, stepped into the office of a real estate broker in Springfield, Massachusetts, the other morning, and finding the broker apparently at leisure, asked him to look at her book. The gentleman politely informed her that it would only be a waste of time, as he could not purchase it. "Oh, never mind that," ejaculated the vivacious young woman, "it won't cost anything to look at it, even if you don't buy. I should like to have you read some portions of it, and see what it is." The accommodating broker took the volume and, glancing at the title page, commenced a perusal of the introduction. This finished, he began at the first chapter, and read carefully and leisurely along. It was about 9 o'clock when he commenced, and an hour passed silently away. Then the book agent began to exhibit signs of nervousness, which were apparently unnoticed by the broker, for he never raised his eyes from the volume, but read steadily on. Eleven o'clock came, and the lady began to walk rather smartly about the room, glancing occasionally out of the windows. At noon the broker was still reading, and the agent wore a decidedly troubled countenance. A few minutes before one o'clock the broker laid the book down, leisurely donned his overcoat and hat, and remarked blandly, "That is a very good book. I am sorry I cannot read more of it, but I am obliged to go to dinner. If you will call in this afternoon, I will read some more of it."

It is a fact, no less apparent, that Wheeling has fallen behind towns of much smaller proportions in the encouragement and support of such an institution, and in fact the Book business in itself has never been a paying one in our city, and consequently has always been kept in connection with some other, and thus received but little attention.

While we have no cause for complaint thus far, we ask for a more general support to the Book and Stationery business, and hope that our increased outlay of money and labor, may meet with a corresponding increase of your patronage, so that we may be enabled at all times to provide our citizens with all the advantages of a complete and well stocked Book Store.

Yours, respectfully,

Laughlin's Infant Cordial.
The child's cure when teething—to relieve inflammation of the gums, to allay uneasiness, to quiet Colic Pains, to promote Sleep, to induce Summer Complaint. This we consider one of the most valuable remedies to be kept in the family when the children are crying their teeth. We are selling thousands of bottles, and have to hear the first person say it is not all we recommended to be.

MOTHERS, have you a sickly, fretful babe that cries the hours of night when you so long for rest, and cry-cry-cry all day and all night long? If you have—listen to reason—be comforted, and so long as you have drops of INFANT CORDIAL and your child will be happy and sweet, and you will be able to take the place of water, and your child will be at once a bottle.
